No doubt, the most important feature of maps was creating them. We have thousands of locations, and Photoshop can easily create a map without you having to do any programming. It'll even make paths and snap to the closest point. This capability extends to graphics too, so you can create your own map, clip art, and various objects and place them in your scenes. Using the magnifying glass on the left side of the tool bar, hold down the mouse button and drag to create a new selection. The selection will be closed—meaning it will be one object—and you can select the object using one of Photoshop's many selection tools. If you want to combine objects into a single selection, just select the objects and choose Merge From Previous by pressing the Alt key. If you have multiple objects selected, you can convert any one of them to a selection by pressing Alt+Backspace. If you'd like Photoshop to create a selection for you, Press + on your keyboard to launch the Selection tool. So that's a lot of layers. On the top layers list, you'll see you have 12 layers that make up this image. You may have layers that Photoshop doesn't show, but if you're working in Photoshop, this is probably an image created by using layers. You can set a default zoom level by selecting "Auto" to make it zoom to your default level when you view the image in the Preview window. If you need to zoom way in, highlighting the "Auto" setting and pressing Shift+Enter, allows you to enter a zoom level that makes the image bigger. The image will resize appropriately when you're finished. To reset the zoom programmatically using the Selection tool, choose "reset zoom" from the Options bar (View menu). You can also add a comment by selecting the "memo" button in the "Properties" panel. You can even add a timestamp using the "Record date" button.
