project. What's new 5-Nov-2017 "Added" category The free and open-source software (FOSS) DataExplorer — created to be a front-end for Google Chrome apps — launched Tuesday with the goal of enabling users to "explore and analyze structured data sets" stored within Web pages. But the first iteration of the application, which works only for data hosted on Google's servers, has a very limited user base and is riddled with bugs, the company said. "DataExplorer is an attempt at a hack of Google Chrome's developer tools to make Chrome's DataViews a bit more powerful," said DataExplorer creator Jon Dierickx. "What we're trying to do is look at the huge collection of data sets being generated in the world today," Dierickx said. "We want to make that data accessible to everyone." An example, he said, could be a website that gathers information on, say, the Chicago Bulls basketball team. The site could store a link to a spreadsheet, perhaps, that contains statistics on the team. DataExplorer has two pieces: a Chrome extension that, when launched, adds a DataView to the browser. The DataView then can be opened and inspected. Additionally, DataExplorer also is a Google Chrome app (which means the extension doesn't require the app to be installed) that opens with a tab displaying information about the data set. DataExplorer works with data sets hosted on Google's servers. "DataExplorer is just a wrapper around Google Chrome's data viewers to make them a bit more feature rich," Dierickx said. "We don't do anything under the hood. The Chrome extension and app just give you a nicer display." DataExplorer's current incarnation is not intended for enterprise or commercial use, Dierickx said. "We aren't trying to sell software. We're trying to give access to the public to make their data accessible." Dierickx is an independent, self-employed Web developer who lives in France. "I've worked with Java, Flash, XHTML, PHP and a ton of other web technologies,"
